I am going to echo atamajakki on Roman settings for everyone. I think I'd be interested in seeing a 2e update for Requiem for Rome as a whole at some point. The feel of 2e is different from the feel of 1e and I'm curious how that would extend into a new version of RfR.

I'd really like to see Mage in Alexandria. The connection with Mages and Alexander has already been seeded, and having Mages in the heart of philosophy and neoplatonism would be awesome.

I'd also like to see Changeling in Classical Greece. There's a reason "Arcadia" is used to describe the realm of the Fae. There's no place more wild and mystical than the ancient Greek countryside.

I'd also like to see Vampire/Changeling British Raj, or a Mage Chandragupta Maurya (which is really only a generation after To The Strongest so it could be more of a continuation of that era a la Fall of the Camarilla than a full Dark Era.) More Indian settings. It's weird how India has not been used all that much in CofD so far, with the exception of Goa in Promethean.

The way the previous book turned out it might be feasible to do that way. Having the 'core' eras being in a set era, then Kickstarter expansions on sections or additional ones, maybe different places from the view of different splats, or showing one group during the fall or rise.

I couldn't say whether Rome was popular enough to warrant it, though.

Beast in Pre-Colonial Australia could be pretty cool. Not only because it's a land where everything can kill you (lots of inspiration for potential horrors), but also because it's a land where you can beasts and geotia drifting along the Songlines. It's a time and place where the lessons a beast is meant to teach isn't outdated, it's the true time when a beast's lessons actually could be the difference between life and death. You can tap into Dreamtime not because it's called Dreamtime, but because it is an immaterial place that is made of thought and story and warning. Also, you can have it interact with the ghost-wolves discussed in WtF 2e, where the beasts gained nightmares from the ghost-wolves, and the ghost-wolves learned how to communicate through dreams from interacting with beasts (resulting in the formulation of the Dream Lodge).

Changeling in 1930-40's Australia. Sort of the opposite situation to the Grimm Dark Era, it is in a time where thousands of stories died and were lost as aboriginal australian's lost the possibility of passing on their culture to the new generations, causing many fae to become desperate and for the hedge to be changing to take on a mix of folklore from migrants. In addition, this was in the middle of the great depression, leading to unemployment going as high as 25% to 29% (depending on what source you look at), meaning gentry could do things like grant boons to mortals in return for doing rituals which keep their (now fading) narrative alive or can offer the person a "job" and take them as a "willing" servant to arcadia meaning their might be a decent amount of loyalists. The era can also reference similiarities between changelings and the stolen generation, but... Doing that would require being very very careful.

Promethean in Gold Rush Australia. Where the flood of immigrants from all over (especially china) caused the country to truly start to be multicultural, the created have perfect opportunity to travel to a country which was still young and still refining itself. It was a time where being a nomad wouldn't be seen as odd, meaning prometheans can prevent wastelands without standing out as strangers. Also it gives prometheans a great chance to see desperation and hope is such an extreme way. Lastly, alchemists would probably make decent use of all the gold, and even if the alchemists are out their for gold, disquiet and desperation can lead to alchemists becoming a considerable problem for the Created who are lured to the gold fields.

It's a little late for that.

One of my intended settings for Changeling 2e is Golden Age of Piracy Freehold of Nassau, due to the massive world of naval superstition and the interplay of folk legend and history that made up that time period, and I think that would be a pretty cool official Dark Era. So throwing that out there, too.

I think the syncretic nature of pirate folklore demands at least partly Geist content.

I'd be "on board" with that, were it not for the fact that Dead Men Tell No Tales.

I would love to see a Mississippi Steamboat era for Vampire, set before the American civil war. Plantation slavery is at its height. Political discourse is going to bubble over into war. Old traditions are being challenged by new ideals and steamboats allow an easy method of trade and travel for Kindred, although the boats themselves will become obsolete within a generation. The combination of brutality and courtly veneer is very vampire and ripe for a southern Gothic treatment, Requiem style. You could play up plantation owning elders against abolitionist neonates. New Orleans would be brought back as a signature city. To keep the setting being too dark, I would portray vampire society as largely wanting to keep their herds healthy since disease could easily decimate mortal populations and most vampires would want to avoid seeing their food source disappear. This would incentivize most vampires to feed carefully. This would lend a certain dramatic irony to proceedings since compared to the depredations and casual brutality of human society, most vampires wouldn't be too bad.

I'd also love to see Mughal India Changeling. To be honest almost any Indian historical setting would suit me but it definitely should be for Changeling!

I believe it's also already been mentioned as a pretty big deal in Mage.

Yes you are right! I remember the Nassau Pirate Republic mentioned somewhere in Mage, but I forget exactly where. Sounds like a great time period for a lot of different settings.

In Mage, Nassau Pirate Republic is made of democratic Nameless Order that Seers of Throne AND Silver Ladder want's to crush.

Nassau Navigations would be awesome.

I'm biased though, as I was born and live in one of the cities that were governed by him in the mid 1600s, Recife, Brazil.

The history of the Jews that accompanied him is specially interesting.

When the Portuguese took back the city, Jews, which were mostly engineers, doctors, lawyers and bankers fled the Portuguese religious persecution.

16 ships departed Recife, 15 made it back to Holland, one was captured by Spanish pirates then rescued by a French ship and released in New Amsterdam, which is known today as New York.

Imagine the Fate plots in that!

Our city is home to the first synagogue of the Americas, which today is a museum. (Services there still occur, but can only be attended by ultra orthodox jews. A friend of mine from a different state was very upset when he tried to attend and was denied entrance for being too "modern".)

Many people here still lament Nassau's and the Jews' departure. We would be a very different people/country had they stayed.

More South American settings are always appreciated. They never get much love.
