I think that correct way to go with Mythos in CoD universe is to analyze each Great Old One on it's own merits. Like I made King in Yellow and his Carcosa as Abyssal Anima Mundi Realm of 'wrong' Atlantis.

As to Great Old Ones as Supernal beings - I do not think it works with basic premise. Supernal Beings are 'perfect', but almost all Old Ones are somehow 'wrong' to reality, even if they are parts of it. They can work as various Lower Depths Realms emanations (like Azathoth as True Fae) or even Abyss corruptions of various elements of CoD reality.

The Lucifage may not like finding out that they aren't the bloodline of fire and brimstone demons, but what can you do. Although, I think it works perfectly fine to have one group of the Lucifage be demon-blooded and another group be Deep One Hybrids.*

Well, who says the Saint's Feast Days care about the calendar as opposed to about when certain Stars are Right? Just because they have ritual magic that works and gives them power and they attribute it to their god, doesn't mean it is that god that answers...

Has anyone else read The Laundry series/books by Charles Stross?

Who says they are "wrong"? Humans. That just means they are "wrong" to our perceptions of comfortable reality, not necessarily reality itself...

Reality. Or rather Quiescence. R'yleh is not more real than Atlantis. Carcosa is noting more than 'star-dream' incarnation.

Also, modern CoD universe is ruled by Exarchs. They are on the Thrones of Reality. Great Old Ones can be Old Gods of previous realities, but surely not this one.

Also remember one thing - Old Ones are beings. They are not 'gods' in terms we understand it. Cthulhu is still just giant squid with tentacles - he have magical powers, is colossal in size. But it's still 'only' creature, not proper reality remaking god.

Gods are Exarchs. Great Old Ones - at least to Lovecraft - are only 'supermonsters'.

Quiescence covers the Supernal. What happens when Sleepers witness the Supernal? Their minds break. What happens when people witness the Great Old Ones? Their minds break.

Who says Atlantis wasn't R'yleh? Not the Mage Chroniclers Guide at the very least.

And who says the Outer Gods don't strike fear into the Exarchs? Or that Exarchs aren't the mere dreaming fragments of Outer Gods? But Cthulhu was only a high priest.

To be fair, minds of Sleepers break when witnessing non-Supernal magic as well.

But yeah, when it comes to the Exarchs they are supermonsters-as-gods. While I don't believe they would fit as Supernal beings for a variety of other reasons, them being 'supermonsters' isn't one of them.

No, Exarchs are humans*-turned-into-gods* - that they are now have traits of 'supermonsters' is just side effect of their Ascension. Remember that now days CoD universe is humancentric.

Cthulhu and company are 'just' supermonsters - they maybe are once Supernal Realms Old Gods, but they Fallen into our reality and are just super powerful monsters/phenomena. I could ascribe to this paradigm as it has most sense with both Mythos and CoD universe lore.

Remember, Great Old Ones are less powerful than Outer Gods. To be faithfull to Mythos, you need to make Great Old Ones as category lower to most powerful beings in reality. Intereting would be making Exarchs equal with Outer Gods...

Most of the time, they are asleep and/or insane, and would like to see humanity dead, devoured, or made slaves. They include Azathoth, Nyarlathotep, and Shub-Niggurath. The Elder Gods are presumed to be good, but are distant and unmoved by humanities cries. Periodically, they may be invoked, but they generally neglect humanity, leaving them in the hands of the Outer Gods.*

Simple analogy is using Ancient Greece Mythology:

If Great Old Ones are Titans, Outer Gods are Olympics Gods.

Putting this on CoD universe, if Outer Gods are Exarchs, then Great Old Ones are Old Gods of Supernal, fallen on Earth, when Exarchs took their Thrones.

Just to play Devil's advocate here, what if the Exarch's don't have as firm of a grip on reality as they pretend? Maybe they drove out a majority of the Old Gods and control a large portion of the Supernal, but some powerful Old Gods managed to hold onto their position, and sometimes, for their own inscrutable reasons, they reach out to influence the Phenomenal World much like the Exarch's communicate with their servants and manifest Ochemeta?

Furthermore, maybe some beings come from distant stars by worming their way through secret paths that few others know about in the Sidereal Wastes? Maybe Carcosa actually can be found on a planet orbiting Aldebaran? Or maybe they are beings native to an alien Temenos?

They aren't necessarily humans-turned-into-gods, whether or not you think the CoD universe is humancentric. If the Lie is something that can be overcome, and Awakening suggests it might be, then it's possible the Exarchs are just your 'supermonsters' who have a really good con going on.

That analogy doesn't neccesarily follow, the Titans were the generation elder to the Olympians and easily on par with their power, whereas the Great Old Ones have sometimes been described as the priests of the Outer Gods.

It should also be pointed out that the Mythos is by its nature collaborative and contradictory. Interpreting the Outer Gods and/or Great Old Ones as "supermonsters" works for some people. Interpreting them as literal gods works for others, and other RPGs have done so. Given the aforementioned collaborative-contradictory nature of the Mythos, the stuff that Chaosium, Pagan Publishing, Final Fantasy, and Paizo have created is just as up for discussion as any other author. We can each then pick and choose what we want to use at our tables. Trying to determine who is "correct" in their interpretation is likely an excercise in futility.

We still need to agree on some general model if fan book is to come. Are we making them all one kind of fenomena or various diffrent things? Like with Azathoth as Divine Fire and Carcosa as Abyssal Anima Mundi Realm.

Is a fanbook coming out of Age of Azar or the Sundered World threads? I made this topic as a place for discussion and centralization if other threads spawn from it. Trying to create a fan book is far too ambitious in my eyes.

So what are doing here? Cause without some fan material as goal all the talk is going to be 'at my table it will be this and that...'
